Teen Chat Decoder Free Download For Windows (Updated 2022)

Kids have their own special language. They always have. Each generation develops it's own slang, and parents have always been clueless to what it all means. As a result, parents are left with nothing but a blank expression when their kids get ready to email them some news or ask them how they are. "What do they mean when they ask me how I am?", is the common reaction. Parents are left with only a few options. 1. "I don't know" The parents response leaves it there, and they are out of their element. The kids can see this, and enjoy it. This makes it a win, win situation for the parent, and the teen knows that the parent doesn't know, and the parent gets to act clueless. 2. "I am fine" This doesn't sound as convincing to the teens, who want to know "how" their parents are. The parents gets credit for getting back to normal, but the parents doesn't have to go through the process of explaining. 3. "I am fine, thank you" This does help the parents in the short run, but it sends a bad message to the teens. It can also send the message that the parents are fake, not authentic, or that they are not a real, genuine parent. Teen Chat Decoder is the answer. Teen Chat Decoder (TCD) is a chat room acronym monitor, that is really no different today than the old fashioned parent/child relationship. There is a lot of "jargon" out there that is used by kids to communicate with their parents. We created a tool that monitors all the acronyms used in any text message between kids and parents. With the advent of cell phones and the use of IM, text messaging, and chat room communication, the old fashioned parent/child relationships have been changed.

Parents are no longer 'clueless' to the vocabulary of their kids. And when parents are always the clueless ones, we'll know it, because kids will use their favorite slang. We created a tool that monitors all the acronyms used in any text message between kids and parents. It's really no different today. Kids still have their own special way of communicating, but with the invention of the Internet, chat rooms, text messaging technologies like Instant Menger, and text to text cell phone messages, parents can and do get hopelessly lost in the jargon. It's easy to use and
