The addition of “HyperMotion” tech is a significant advancement in the quality and authenticity of FIFA’s character animation, which previously only has the ability to depict human movement. The use of motion capture means that players’ eyes, mouth and head movements are integrated into the gameplay. This technology also allows the player to run, stand, jump, shoot, dribble and pass with realistic fluidity, and with intelligent and believable animations in every direction. Using Motion Capture technology The development team started by recording players’ movements in a high-end football studio, where they were followed by a camera operated by our motion capture technicians. “We learned a lot about human movement while developing the game and were surprised how much players have in common. We became more aware of the many ways players move during a match,” said Marcus Sorensen, Technical Director, EA Sports. The team processed the data and created a player model. This consisted of over 20 meters of motion capture data, which was done in a very short amount of time. During this time the team was in collaboration with the player’s agents, giving them access to the measurements and exercises. The model was later adjusted by the animation team to move with the right speed, ball speed and movement. In addition, they adjusted the models specific to the positions of the players, such as penalty takers and defensive midfielders. The face and head movements of players are recorded through a “head-mounted camera,” which records the data, processes it and plays it back in game. All facial expressions are captured through a “logicvolumetric head model.” The facial animations combine a face-tracking system with a range of facial expressions, to create believable expressions, and how the player feels for every emotion, including disgust, anger or surprise. Motion capture technology is not only used to create the player models, it also helps create the game’s animations. “We used motion capture to animate the player’s movements on the pitch and also the interactions between them. We have more than 10 meters of motion capture data of the game scenarios from the striker to the goalkeeper. This is our most expressive data set, which allows us to create more realistic animations. With this data, we can also re-animate players so that the game feels fresh after a new patch,”
